Rent or buy: Amazon, Apple, Google Play The idea of watching a good movie after a long, difficult or especially unpleasant day can be the perfect solution. The film, like books, music, and a host of other human inventions, is partly designed with the idea of escaping in mind. During an early history you can watch your family die around you a young cold all the time slave away for two turns. The story in all its forms was a good way to forget that you had to bury your mom, dad and grandfather earlier that morning next to your only goat. Today's day and age has different challenges and tribulations, but the fact remains that our society undoubtedly uses television and movies to avoid. Two hours later you were adequately distracted and raised and may be ready to return to let the daily grind the next day. Of course, there are many different kinds of bad days, and sometimes you need the right kind of movie to change the mood. Let's take a look at a few different kinds of weekends you might have and what our prescribed film treatments are for this particular crisis. Bad day at work? Maybe you lost your job, or maybe it just was a long day at the end of a long week, but most people have a day off at work anyway before they hit retirement. Well, when the inevitable time comes, we have great upbeat but sympathetic movies so you've been through the struggle. The first has to be, out of necessity, Office Space, a 90s comedy that has become a classic go-to movie when work gets you down, especially for a scene in which employees bust apart a company computer with various tools in a fit of rage. That being said, the film has a happy ending, with Milton's much-abused side character left sitting on a sunny beach with plenty of money, and the main character finds a career that satisfies him. Ferris Bueller's Day Off, starring Matthew Broderick, is another wonderful feel-good film about making a well-deserved day off. After a long day, it may serve as inspiration for the next day, or it may just help you forget some less than warm While you watch Broderick lip-syncing twist and shout at the float in the middle of the street. Fight your significant other? Whether it's a breakup or just really bad bad Fighting with this special guy or girl tends to leave one in a bad mood. Now, some might argue that 500 days of summer and the eternal sun of impeccable reason don't feel good about movies, but they both have hopeful and romantically open endings without being too saccharine or written by Nicholas Sparks. And they might leave the audience feeling better with a warm and meaningful end, despite not the cliches of love stories you see elsewhere. 500 Days of Summer takes a look at the relationship as it falls apart, and how one takes herself back, while the eternal sun of the impeccable mind looks at the pain of bad and good memories and the desire to stay together despite this pain. An existential crisis? Some days are bad because of more than just minutae. Whether it's the beginning of a midlife crisis or the end of an era, there are days when the meaning of life just feels ungraspable. The secret life of Walter Mitty is especially appropriate if the crisis of a career is linked as he puts into perspective an adventure that life can be like finding love, and how a person can be important without even knowing it. Walter Mitty, played by Ben Stiller, is a man with an active imagination, but a pretty mundane life, or so he thinks. But when he loses an important photo at work, he goes on an incredible adventure and discovers a lot about himself. I Heart Huckabees is a more direct solution to existential angst, following husband and wife as a team hired to figure out existential problems and people's questions. Noisy neighbors? We all had a neighbor who just didn't know how to keep the volume up to a reasonable level while holding you late into the night. Or maybe they would like to leave things in your backyard, or their dog thinks your rose bushes are his personal stomping grounds. Either way, there are a few comedies that can help put things in perspective and remind us that it can always be worse. Neighbors, a comedy-looking Seth Rogen, features a new father who is forced to live next to a fraternity and all the wicked nightmares that come out of him. As a whole nine yards is an old movie, but still a classic. Starring Bruce Willis (Die Hard) and Matthew Perry (Friends) in the tale of a nervous dentist wreck with a monster-wife, and his recently moved to a neighbor who turns out to be a gangster on the run. Problems with the car? Nothing can ruin a day faster than an unsuitable car crash, whether it's a flat wheel, a wing bender, or some unknown source of steam coming out from under the hood. Having a car break down is like having a very expensive child get sick and then refuse to let you go to work. Luc kily, for those days when you feel that your way of transporting is perhaps the most uncomfortable and dangerous in the world, there is Little Miss Sunshine, feel good family film featuring one of the best old-fashioned car problems out there - the kind where you have to push the car to its going. Going. At the top of this bit of humor, the film itself is incredibly touching, focusing on family grief, grief, and the importance of supporting each other and not being afraid to eat ice cream for breakfast. Planes, Trains and Cars is a classic Steve Martin film, covering basically any transport mountain ever experienced on this land.
